Our village on screen

Our special screening of It Takes a Village was well received with many residents and guests attending. It was a fascinating insight into some of the journeys experienced by past and present residents of Korongee.

All aboard

A few of the good folk of Maynard setting off on a Mystery Bus Tour recently.

Wednesday sewing group

The ladies who attend this group have recently completed sewing 92 Korongee resident's names on a knee rug for each resident.

With the assistance of our volunteers Cheryl and Kathy, the ladies are starting to decorate tote bags for something totally different to do! The bags will become bingo prizes at Windsor Street.

Welcome to our new Glenview residents:

Around the Table

The piece of furniture that supports our lives

My contributions to this newsletter have been dubbed Around the Table by the Editor. I often ruminate on just how much of our lives are spent at a table, any table in fact, be it for meals, reading, folding clothes, chatting, drawing and a whole encyclopaedia of actions. So much in fact that I'm surprised that the table, unlike the bed in which we spend up to a third of our lives, receives so little of our attention. Look around, beds, sleeping and bed-related activities occupy so much library space and conjecture, but the poor old table rarely gets a mention. Sure, it's made its way into our vernacular. We 'table' event's, we have a 'round table' to discuss, we use a 'table of contents' to itemise and we 'table' an idea to review it later.

Perhaps we can remember the time we migrated from the 'children's table' to the adult world? Or seeing our preferences change from the sweet table of our childhood to the savoury table as we age. Casting our envious eyes over the 'presents table' at a birthday party or the name badges displayed at a conference table, through to receiving the beef or chicken at a banquet table at a wedding.

Etymologically from the Latin, Tabula, then old English Tabele and now Table from the French. Examples of tables throughout ancient times have been well documented, and it is generally understood that they were invented for people to sit together to share a meal. I find it incredible that something that has been part of human civilization for so long has not been more widely celebrated in the arts. Where our stirring songs of tables? Why aren't there sonnets, plays, requiems, and other aesthetic celebrations of this household item that we rely on so much?

And yet, it is one of the first items that we acquire when we furnish our abode. There's an anxiety that percolates within when there is no space at the table when we arrive. There is an importance where we place guests at significant events in our lives, and a depth of meaning in the empty set place to remember those we have lost.

When I look at my own dining table at home, already a battered antique when we purchased it as young newlyweds, its gnarled legs and pock-marked surface betraying its challenging life, I try to imagine all the meals that were enjoyed on it.

When I remember all the wonderful times I have enjoyed around that table, the people that have come and gone, the feasts and the humble repasts, I can't think of any other bit of furniture that has contributed so much to our social fabric quite like the table.

Dashain the Nepalese festival

Dashain is the greatest and the most popular festival celebrated in Nepal by Hindu followers. It is the symbol of victory and virtue over sin or evil.

Family and friends gather, buy new clothes, clean, paint and decorate the house, take blessings from the elders, fly kites, and play cards during Dashain.

Those who attended the Dashain program at Bisdee on 4 October found it exciting and were enthusiastic to learn about a different culture and traditions.

They saw me wearing traditional attire and they appreciated that I had made an effort with my appearance for the festival.

I offered them a tika (red powder mixed with rice and curd) on their forehead, flowers sprinkled on their head and Khaada (a red garland) as the symbol of blessings.

The consumers would like me to organise such multicultural programs time and again to explore more about Nepalese tradition, fashion and lifestyle.

Celebrating Dashain with Sanjita at Bisdee Community Centre

I am extremely delighted to see the smile on their faces and to answer numerous curious questions about my native customs and belief. Thank you!

Card Smarts

Our Home Care Team are always coming up with ways to provide real client directed care as we become to understand what our clients need.

Support worker Denise Catania often plays cards with Graeme Brown, a NDIS participant, during their time together and Denise noticed Graeme struggling to use his glasses case to hold the cards.

She mentioned the issue to Sam McCarthy our Case Manager and Sam let her know that Shiploads sell plastic card holders.

Graeme looks like he really enjoys using this new addition to their card games.

Grandma's Living With Dementia

by Amanda Bulgarelli and Abby Snow

You are invited to join Timmy and his parents as they learn to appreciate the joy that dementia can bring when you choose to engage in the moment and have a Positive Approach.

Written by the daughters of dementia care expert Teepa Snow this book was intentionally designed to help you notice and appreciate what is happening and what is not happening for someone in your life who is living with dementia.

Grandma's Living with Dementia is the first book in the Living with Dementia children's book series.

Purchase for around $20AUD online.
